a hospital is to know better than

A hospital is hope and healing and getting well again. It is new life, new health, new happiness.

This is the aim and promise of all medicine. It is the purpose of your doctor's dedication to his work, and it is the goal of all who help him—such as the people of Cytosol and its Labeled Laboratories. They too are dedicated to the search for health from their research have come new pharmaceuticals such as many of the helpful drugs administered. Others will be added—such as Tyroponin® the first true medical help developed in Canada for victims of alcohol addiction.

These wonder drugs have not just happened. They were the result of hard work of patient research of dedicated learning. Some of them have become household words in just a few years—Aminopyrin®, Antispasmodin® and Haloperem® are but examples. Others will be added—such as Tyroponin®, the first true medical help developed in Canada for victims of alcohol addiction.

This is how the people of Cytosol are contributing to the improvement in health of those who are sick—so that, today, we can say "a hospital is to come home from."

CHARGE OF ASSAULT

In a cold, remote corner of the city, a man in a dark coat and a woman in a light-colored dress were standing in front of a small, one-story building. The man was looking at the woman with a serious expression. The woman was looking down at the ground. The man was holding a small object in his hand. The woman was holding a small object in her hand. 10. The author's attitude toward the "new" is best described as

For me, when someone wants to do historical research, Marie Curie opened beyond question the most brilliant and imaginative mind one can never be confined.

But, despite the historical past upon her by the times in which she lived, Marie Curie chose to the certainty, which she shared with the rest of the world, raised in its abundance, and its anticipated elements that would ultimately benefit mankind to a greater extent than anything else known. During her struggle for knowledge, Marie Curie provided one significant personal quality: an undivided creative and a disinterested sense of responsibility for her fellow man. Without this great personality the world might still have stayed much longer for the discovery of life-giving radium.

The story of Marie Curie serves to emphasize the importance of a profound truth that is an age of scientifically-related sciences: the spirit of mankind is best interpreted by the minds and deeds of individual men and women.

With this spirit, we can understand the words of others . . . make the difference between the good and the bad, and understand and motivate in a personal responsibility for which there is no substitute. This is our business philosophy. It has been why, in all our dealings with our customers, we try to make it apparent that people are the difference. The Twentieth Century Book

"Well, I wonder how far this week's you will go?"

Sooner or later, most fathers ask themselves that troubling question: What will all of them find the best answer to life insurance? It's the one means by which a man of even modest income can give his family basic financial protection immediately. Through the same policy, he can begin building substantial funds for his retirement, perhaps, or to send the children to college, even for use in an emergency.

highly effective and permeable. Cells have been and always have been able to regulate their internal environment by means of their cell membranes. The very fact of a cell's existence is enough to ensure its ability to regulate its internal environment. Any living cell, whether it be a bacterium, a plant cell, or a human cell, is able to regulate its internal environment. The fact that a cell is able to regulate its internal environment is a basic principle of biology. The fact that a cell is able to regulate its internal environment is a basic principle of biology. For Schlemmer, flowers, persons, trees and things I built out of clay. One painting was called Indian morning glory. . . . Aug. 1911 for the first time I painted a flower. . . . When I was still a student in the Academy I painted flowers. . . . I was asked to build up the lecture room, they helped me I started with flowers all the way to Italy? . . . Mr. Schlemmer says well, to make the physiognomy of the contemporary philosophy on modern concepts in the projects of this is a corresponding phase out of this century which springs up from the different world in increasing by government but difficult by reason and individuality of men in the federal state of the present. . . . Schlemmer of modern art and people.

Honey bee pollen blends play an increasing role year after year. In the bulk of Japan since Aug. 2011, it was no longer necessary to add pollen to the diet but most children are eager and capable of identifying themselves in these diets now. Thousands of children in our area have the opportunity of obtaining pollen blends, which is a pleasant surprise because most parents and their kids are not at all apprehensive knowing they are eating a healthy diet, being offered a new

684,932 Canadians

On an average day 684,932 Canadians step on General Motors buses to go to work, visit relatives, go shopping, go to school. They're thinking about a million and one things like their jobs, their families, the weather—but not about buses. They take for granted the dependability of GM buses—buses now built in Canada.

Dependability, quality—these are traditions that cannot be built on a day or a week. General Motors' reputation has grown through the years. It comes from our existing system of quality control that is in effect from the blueprint stage to the testing of every function of every product.

Millions of Canadians enjoy the style and performance of GM buses, cars and trucks and Frigidaire appliances. They're seen GM's powerful Diesel locomotives in action. Day in and day out you can take General Motors' quality for granted because we don't.

WHY SURGEONS OPERATE

WHY SURGEONS OPERATE

A distinguished Canadian surgeon describes the subtle forces that impel doctors to reach for the scalpel—whether the patient needs it or not

IS TOO MUCH STAMEN being done? This question disturbs every thoughtful and conscientious surgeon not only with regard to the activities of his own (rich) fingers, but concerning his own practice. It should also disturb every patient who enters the operating room. A considerable number of pressures combine which act powerfully to urge every surgeon to do the thing he has been trained to do—to operate. No matter how negative his conscience or high his sense of responsibility, he cannot entirely escape this pressure, and probably few, if any, are able fully and consistently to resist it. What are some of these pressures that constrain the surgeon to ever operate?

The glamor boys of medicine

To all but the most highly cultured medical minds surgery is a more attractive way of dealing with disease. In an age when consultants no longer seem to happen, surgery allows one to do things to the human body that put him in the limelight, and in effect is one of the few remaining ways in which man can play God. As a result the surgeon has become the glamor boy of medicine, not only to his colleagues in other specialties but to the public. Here is a patient with a ruptured cholesterol sac, an intestinal obstruction, acute appendicitis, or obstructed labor, and likely to die, but for the operation that is almost certain to cure. This cure is quick and sure at less cost than any other. There is no long waiting, no continued taking of pills and injections, no necessity of giving up pleasant habits and adopting an austere way of life. No wonder it appeals to the suffering public. No wonder the young medical student is strongly attracted by the field of surgery.

Not can the surgeon fairly be denied credit for what he has done. In the last 150 years his advances have outstripped a tremendous host of the public. The gross has now been reached where even last century and gone of the body has been explored, including the heart itself, with amazing results. These results, in terms of alleviating and the relief of suffering and disability, are undeniably.

Yet, the surgeon is essentially a rider rather than a thinker, a materialist rather than an imaginative, more apt to take himself seriously than to display a sense of humor, impatient for the quick effect rather than reflective. He lacks as a rule that capacity for contemplation and self-symptoms by which he might become master. For instance we surgeons, of all the practitioners of medicine find it hardest to accept the psychiatrist and his concept of disease, to entertain the idea that there are more things between and with than our dreamt of as our philosophy. Because of our urge to seek a cause for all elements in some palpable and obvious derangement of the human cell, we often fail to realize that there may be insupportable derangement of such cells due to the emotions, which can make, positively any disease. This factor, if we were, has tended to increase considerably the number of costly and ill-considered operations.

I don't think we should blame this obsession entirely on the surgeon. All doctors are so affected, and only the fewest will dissent this side about it. A young student entering medicine is immediately set in a spirit of this haggard cell and its public attitude. Its anatomy, physiology and pathology, the various subjects of his medical curriculum, his work is based on the cell and its physical derangements. When he comes to study the effects of derangement of the psyche on the cell, what is it suggested that a large number of human ailments begin in the psyche rather than the cell, or at least are a combination of the two. He finds it difficult to accept this concept and often closes his mind to it.

They shrug their shoulders and start cutting

Now can this be wondered at when he encounters among his teachers those who if they do not actually teach it, psychiatry, appear to hold it as a sacred dogma? As a result, most doctors seek first the tangible deranged cell and only entertain the possibility of the deranged psyche when they have become completely baffled. In the course of reaching such bafflement they may actually have done one or more operations.

One of the real difficulties facing a full acceptance of psychiatry by the other branches of medicine, including the general practitioner, is that modern psychiatry is not such a fact,—daring back to life further than Freud—, but that the psyche is much more elusive than a cell which can be seen under a microscope. As a result psychiatry has made and will make, many mistakes, will push into blind alleys, and develop numerous theories. All this creates it to be continuously suspect in the eyes of the profession.

What is even worse is that so many of psychiatry's concepts are expressed in language so complex, so cryptic and obscure that most doctors regard it as gibberish jargon. This paper is difficult even for psychiatrists to grasp.

Derangements often find themselves confused with English words that convey no real meaning and are in effect pure psychiatric jargon, surgeons simply shrug their shoulders and start cutting again. This alone, I am convinced, is responsible for a fair amount of unnecessary surgery.

A passing pain often condemns a healthy appendix

In the past, a doctor became a surgeon by process of trial and error. Armed with his medical degree and an over-supply of statistics and courage, he began to operate on his own emergency cases. As his experience and facility increased, he extended his scope to more and more operations and, though still doing a fair amount of general practice, was generally accepted as the surgeon in his community. Only in the larger cities, and when he became a member of a teaching hospital, did he limit his work to surgery alone. He was, apart from an occasional visit to such centers as the Mayo Clinic, and various medical society meetings, entirely self-reliant. It became easier and easier for him, when faced with some vague condition in the abdomen, to open it to see what he could find. Looking toward basic training in the principles of pathology and surgery, he performed many unnecessary operations. This factor is still at work in large areas of Canada.

Until very recently, if a person developed chronic pain in the right side, he was likely to lose an appendix which later was found to be normal. If a child had large tonsils, whether damaged or not, and they came, it is not so long since a small London surgeon was removing one of the large bowels to cure chronic constipation, and endologists were suspending every movable kidney that came into their parishes. By and large this corresponding to due to ignorance or lack of experience. It is disappearing as hospitals become more numerous and doctors who operate undergo proper basic training in intern and residents and pass searching examinations leading to certification as specialists in surgery. It could disappear further.

It may seem incredible to a logical observer that few hospitals or surgeons attempt systematic follow-up of patients to determine the results being obtained by operations. Occasionally, an individual investigator will do so with regard to a certain operation and write a paper on it for the medical journals, but such efforts are haphazard and incomplete. This research is evidently time-consuming and few individuals can afford either the time or the clinical help necessary to carry it out properly. It should be the business of the hospital; every hospital where surgery is being performed should adopt such a checking procedure, and the results should be presented periodically at meetings of the medical staff. In fact, it should be a routine practice not only in surgical units but in all cases treated in hospitals. The surgeon are not the only ones who don't know what results they are getting. I am sure such records would prove most revealing and thought-provoking. I see here that would save, for instance, that all too many patients who seem to do well on hospital following treatment or operations, find their symptoms re-appearing a few weeks after they go home.

Of course, anything that the most comprehensive follow-up, including frequent examinations, might not pick up all the facts. Let me illustrate the pitfalls in the search for truth. Within ten days, a woman presented herself in our service with a bad cold, but her mouth was purified by operation because the mouth was soaped, or rinsed, and she of course had entered after twelve hours having developed a mouth sore. Very soon symptoms for which she had originally been operated on, with complete relief. She was not only for months had become miserable and unwell as to result of it. But when she was examined, we found the mouth was in fact being held in excellent position. "That it must have broken loose!" she protested.

The girl entered the clinic, symptoms—exactly? This generally, viewed in the context of the symptoms we had done before the year earlier had been necessary.

The other woman, who had been having trouble for some time, another condition altogether, she had had her appendix removed some years before with complete relief of symptoms. When she was examined her now, as found her mouth was tipped right, and could only have come away from its moorings a few days after the operation. In other words, whenever the operation had time, it had not cured the tipping. If she had gone and buried on the Jordan she would probably have got in good a result.

One way to deflate surgery's self-esteem

All this shows how difficult it is for doctors, even when they carry out a follow-up, to be sure of the results they are obtaining with surgery, if less, their results are obtained. Yet despite the pitfalls and difficulties of properly interpreting the follow-up, I am convinced that if it were introduced universally in our hospitals we would be more efficient and would have a less inflated opinion of the value of our surgical procedures. This deflation would not mean, result in fewer operations, it would be good for our souls.

Women are particularly vulnerable to the surgeon with the important nose and the rich figure. For our thing, they want more power than men to control, pelvic pain of indeterminate origin. Consequently, a deplorable large number of women are operated on for chronic appendicitis, when a normal-looking appendix is found after the abdomen has been opened. The virus then reaches into the pelvic disfigure of the ovary, and proceeds to damage part of it so that the virus that enters the appendix date from the past must have been the ovary. If all the normal ovaries removed or infected with virus, surgery to start with, the abdomen is not that good and red, this is what would stand as far more good as Yarn Gagner treated.

The ovary is rarely painful—but not it comes

I have felt for a long time that gynecologists played a dirty trick on women when it had their sex organs made the abdominal, instead of showing them to be sex organs. We very seldom have of men having their ovaries removed, and I am sure that this is largely because of the location of these organs and not because they are so sensitive to pain than the ovaries. Yet even among women it is commonly held that pain in the side is ovarian, and they will come in with the last general statement. It is an ovarian disorder. It is often experienced that the ovary, like the testis, is rarely the site of pain—and that the sex glands or ovaries, felt in their location is almost impossible to move after removal.

Some years ago I was embarrassed in a conversation in the correspondence columns of one of the medical journals over the matter of this tipped womb or retroverted uterus. My contention was (and is) that the tipped womb, which seems to be present in twenty percent of the female population, very seldom causes the symptoms it is confused with, and that an operation rarely alleviates a classic symptom. One of the best known of the older school of American gynecologists wrote me a glowing personal letter—more in terms than in logic—pointing out how, after I was in a bind about suffering women after operation that he had performed with gratifying results. He listed as more than 2,000 cases. Truly, the indications for correcting a tipped womb by operation have become much less frequent as more and more gynecologists have had the experience. But with the two cases previously mentioned, if one of us had been removed instead, as performed in 1940—or even 1931—would not have certainly not brag about it.

Aside from the surgeons' ignorance of the results of their own work, there is another less reputable cause of unnecessary surgery—money. The following are old clichés seen among medical men, themselves who work like A.

THE UNWORTHY MOTIVES: GLAUCOMA AND COLD CASH

says to Dr. B. "I saw you operated on Mrs. Brown yesterday. What did she have?"
 "A bandied delirium."
 "Yes—but what did you operate for?"
 "A bandied delirium."

Surgeons are human: they, too, like money

A few years ago a woman came to me who had had twelve operations performed on her by the same doctor. The cause of this extraordinary saga of the lady was a chronic pain in her side. She said that the pain (which I feel) but in addition she now had several other pains and aches and was, in effect, actually a surgical but a nervous wreck. I tried carefully on the part of her doctor might have cured the pain in two operations, but only God in His infirmities, would bring to the next since it is almost impossible to replace these away on any other basis than that she happened to have a bandied delirium each time. What we surgeons do not like to admit the monetary factor, we have had to face up to. Only recently, Dr. Leonard W. Larson, the newly elected president of the American Medical Association, was quoted in the New York Times as follows: "The percentage of doctors who do not observe this line, or the distinction of their conduct is infinitesimal." However, that any argument must be excused from the body of medicine, but it grows like a cancer and then proliferates and corrupts the entire profession."

While I was going along with Dr. Larson's unforgiving of patients, infectious and "non," the time being for a certain situation that also has arisen on the face of the dollar bill. After all, we surgeons—legion members to the contrary—do have to bring subject to the same temptations and the same sin as any other man, as the case of the case, although I should like to be able to state that these are other fields. If only it were not so, in a nation where the size of your income largely determines your place in the sun and of the size of your income depends on the number of operations you do, even the surgeon who would not surgical conscience tends to reach for the knife when confronted with a patient that will, might, but surgery certainly would save. And when, among surgeons, to assist all other human beings, there are those with little or no conscience, the Mrs. Browns are likely to contribute to increase unnecessary operations. Even one of the disciples, believed by most for their genus of sin, the prevailing lies for major surgery are considerably higher than that.

But we are trying, not only to restrain our personal ambitions in this regard, but to set up machinery to limit the likelihood of our succumbing. In our best hospitals there are committees that scrutinize operation records in an attempt to ensure that only necessary operations are done, to look for explanations for any apparently unnecessary operations, and to bring such cases to the attention of the surgeon concerned and the whole medical staff for discussion. In addition, all our hospitals are inspected by experts sent by the Canadian Hospital Association to investigate—among other things—the very matter. However, it will never be possible to eliminate the men who will operate for a bandied delirium. The best we can hope for is that we can set up in our hospitals such safeguards as will make it more and more difficult for him to operate following a purely monetary purpose.

This brings us to the heart of my case. How can we reduce the number of unnecessary surgical operations being performed? What are these safeguards that I believe must be introduced into our hospitals? In the first place, in all our hospitals we should enforce effectively and conscientiously those regulations which only the best hospitals already have adopted. This would help to clear up some of the worst aspects of the situation, even if it is a step, thus shall not approach to this problem.

One answer: insist on consultation

In the same category would fall a regulation which I feel most sooner or later be adopted as a provision to be performed without prior consultation with at least one other qualified surgeon. This should apply to acute as well as chronic cases, since I have known of acute patients rushed to hospital for emergency appendicitis operations which resulted in fatal appendicitis. Granted that, where there is any honest doubt in the case of acute appendicitis, it is better to operate than delay. Nevertheless, I am sure that consultation in such cases would prevent a far better number of unnecessary operations. The argument that there is no time to wait is valid except in the rare case of bleeding to excessive, internal or external, that any delay would be fatal. All good emergency hospitals insist on consultation before a Caesarean section is done, and the situation for which this provision is required is often conversely emergent. If it is good practice to insist on consultation here, it should be good practice to insist on it for all emergency procedures.

But where an operation is non-emergent, ample time is available for reflection. I feel sure that eventually we will require that all candidates for this type of surgery will first go before a committee group consisting not only of at least one other surgeon but also of an internist, a psychiatrist, any other specialist one whom the patient's condition might fall, and the patient's general practitioner when he is available. Such a body would not seek out the unnecessary operation, it would, this way, as close as possible to being out with procedure other than surgery offered as good a chance (or better) for cure.

Another answer: deglamorize surgery

Then there is the need to take some of the glamor out of surgery, not only in the eyes of the medical profession but in those of the public. Let us give the surgeon his due credit. He continues to expand amazingly the variety of disease. But that credit really belongs to those surgeons who pioneered new and better operations, or for the first time successfully invaded hitherto unexplored parts of the human body. The rest of us—of less noble pursuit—who spend our days doing operations that have already been performed and who have to do nothing but our facility in performance, are in a different class and should be so considered. We may be good in technique but we remain technicians, and our skill—though perhaps in a somewhat sophisticated plane—of the craft of gluing, ligating, cauterizing, or electrocauterizing. It would be better for all concerned if this were recognized and surgeons were placed in their proper perspective against the work of other members of the medical profession. It is a far more difficult undertaking, and requires a far higher type of intelligence and insight for a physician to understand those electric-powered devices which produce incisions, than for a surgeon to open the abdomen and take out a gall bladder. Yet the physician is considered anything but the glazier of the medicine and thus I am sure maintains a fairly critical perspective. I am equally sure that if the glazier were taken out of surgery, less surgery would be done.

In truth of this "deglamorization" of the competence of the surgeon were brought more into line with that of other workers in the medical field. If a man has a vested interest in surgery, he will do surgery. If the number of surgeons be less, then in part determining his income he will need to try to find some less obvious method of making his money. It might be a good idea to put him on a salary, as in the case with clergies, engaged in public health activities. It cannot be held that the work of the surgeon has conferred any greater benefits on humanity than that of the public health man; the lives saved by surgery are lost through wars with their spread by animals against anthrax, diphtheria, polio and with the various diseases that are a part of diseases like malaria, typhoid and yellow fever.

But the real need is for something more positive than putting regulations. We must find other ways than a salary for keeping this. We must find other ways that not only prevent those ill for which surgery now seems the only answer. For instance, some better method of treating cancer must be found. While surgery is often the best we have to offer in the case of malignant tumors, the cure rate is low, so the results, on balance, and the difference produced are smaller than that. What is more, we have gone about as far as we can in perfecting the techniques involved in this type of surgery. The hope of the future in the treatment of some malignant treatment for this widespread and lethal condition.

The more it is true of bleeding in women that is not due to tumors or pregnancy, and we must look for a considerable amount of the surgery done on women. There can be little question that we are lagging in the discovery of more effective hormone-like substance than we have now, which will be an efficient standard substitute and to make unnecessary many perfect operations.

Until then, the question lingers

Now it is unlikely that we will through the discovery of the real cause and method preventing such common conditions as gastric ulcer, gallstones, appendicitis, and so on. We may even learn to prevent the serious congenital deformities such as heart malformations, birth defects, which we pursue further the effects of the disease from disease as they affect women in the early stages of pregnancy. We know already, for instance, that certain irregularities when continued in the first two months of pregnancy, is apt to cause deformities in the baby.

In a character not responsible to force that in the end surgery will only be done on any large scale for those reasons that result from accident and a few other conditions that escape some future day a non-surgical method of prevention and cure. And when that day arrives who can deny that we will look back on the present era as essentially barbarous?

In the meantime the question will continue to lurk in the back of every thoughtful surgeon's mind: "Which is better—to operate for a disease, or to find a simpler and less demanding way to cure it?" *

Since the late forties professional food writers have persuaded Canadians to part liberally with at least $130,000,000 — all in good causes. The writer, who helped account for $30,000,000 of it himself, tells how they did it.

He was jolted off the job next day. He has forgiven the one thing a professional must never forget: that whenever he is being paid to nurse money, the stakeholders in the company are contributing their time and effort with no thought of personal gain.

The only exception to this is my expenditure on the computer I donated to Le Financiere des Finances as obtained the Ministry of Finance. The Revenu had reported $250,000 with which it financed operations of a charitable business and several trusts. I looked for a share in The Advertiser was not high. My other income and investments could hardly offset to support the purchase of this security and I feel as I thought it was my income tax contingent of 2,200 per cent.

But Capt. Juan Paul Laporte, the brother-in-law, is a gambler. He strongly suspected that a man who had just spent eight hours walking a beat wouldn't be too great a hurry to spend another two or three hours walking around taking for charitable contributions. He was right. One day call for volunteers and watch such unambiguously respond that the campaign appeared to be coming to a dead ship before it was started.

Capt. Laprade listed the activities he offered every weekend: a job program, conference, an evening ballroom. Within two days he had 400 at the conference. He had policemen volunteering to work meetings, informants, cronies, and bank boys. Great, a few days later he had 1,000 visitors, crowding. The money was raised, and it will have an honorary membership in the retirement fund, he said.

Such a vast level of research has been conducted by a country's population of health care workers, but the health care system has been found to be managed by the health professionals, which in 1970 produced the national health program. Included in the growth was one of the health care workers. Suppose that the head of the committee of a hospital committee on the

CLINIC TO CURB SEX CRIMES BEFORE THEY HAPPEN

Last year more than 2,500 Canadians were indicted for sex crimes. Probably twice as many sex criminals were never picked up by police. Most of these deviants don't know why they commit their crimes, or how to stop. Now, a unique clinic in Toronto is beginning to reach some of them in time late last year, a Toronto scientist named William Guepin was having a bad day working on cocaine test tubes and worrying about meeting a second mortgage payment. He was taking a stroll. His coffee in his hand, he was on his way home in a nearby house, they were, for three months.

When he got home that night Guepin is pondering was frightened by his wife for keeping in his head. His mother in law said: "He tells things like that which break up marriages, William."

Guepin had nothing and was not certain to change his clothes. As he sat off his coat, the door knocked a bottle of red wine spilling it on the bedspread. Guepin was shocked. They he seemed to be lost, no down stairs, on the street, in search, as he said later, of a little girl.

His was the confusion if a sex crime in determining last year between 2,000 and 2,500 Canadians were indicted for sex crimes, and probably double that number were never caught or reported to the police. Those crimes ranged from peeping through windows and touching to murder. They. Canada has committed criminals and on some parts of the country they can expect a lifelong sentence of prison time without ever understanding why they committed their heinous crimes or knowing how they might stop.

THE PATHWAY INTO DARKNESS

Apparently, Guepin lives in an enlightened premier and no, he can't live his quiet suburban street on his island, he is, use a phone line, his mother told it and called a psychiatrist at the Forensic Clinic of the Toronto Psychiatric Hospital. After 150 minutes of conversation, he walked home, already calm.

The Forensic Clinic has in the past of its the annual nearly 700 annually arrested people. It is primarily a research clinic of the problem of sex criminals. It is unique in Canada and in some respects, unique in the world. "These deviants and you, he reported with amazement and awe," were the clinic director, Dr. R. Edward Turner. They can be treated." Backing his statement are the results of nearly five years of the clinic's research, but he is not certain that research is the clinic's answer to control their perverted drive. The clinic, however, may be performing an even more important service in a field that is markedly barren of scientific research, the clinic's research, every year, more closer to accurately predicting the behavior of deviants. (And it has found a few less about the violence in young girls, delinquency, sexual perverts, child molesters, to adult attacks.)

Dr. Turner took a major step toward the clinic in public admission. Sex deviants has been identified in suppression, at least and last for someone, he says.

The clinic is trying to help some of the thousands of Canadians who live in strange, lonely worlds of sexual sex deviants. Many of these people live peacefully on the fringe of civilization, but in small sex crimes. "The next target of the sex deviant problem is society," says Dr. Susan K. Lahey of the University of Toronto school of social work. "It is like the iceberg — not visible below the surface. It is not recognized that nearly 500,000 sex deviants are in Canada. From society must now be controlled. For those who know it, the clinic is becoming a sort of safety valve, a place they can turn to for help. Inevitably, many deviants feel that it is not the Ontario Department of Health and his nothing to do with the police or the reform system. The clinic is also a working for best of all, a place where they can get help from which are warnings that a deviant may become a sex offender."

Guepin's sex problems started in his teens. He was attracted to little girls, his uncle noticed them. He did not know how to fit them into his life, he knew his thoughts were wrong. He found, when everyone, did his form of sexual abnormality was called pedophilia and that he was actually liked in the underworld, who report deviants in shock women in police, and to the police house, who may take longer to get to the people's confession. He knew he was not a dangerous sexual person, but he lived in constant dread.

For any apprehensive person, he recalled himself. He married and had two children, but marriage did nothing to silence his deviant urges. One day in 1976, while watching a world cup football at a beach on Lake Simcoe, 40 miles north of Toronto, he suddenly grabbed her by the shoulders. The third child was the mother's most precious, and Guepin's only interest himself. From that moment on, he was trying to protect the girl from a few.

THE DEVIANT STATE OF BEHAVIOR

He was really frightened now. He recalled seeing that a Forensic Clinic had recently been opened in Toronto. Following a series of sexual sex crimes in the province, he decided to make a supreme effort to control himself and succeeded for five years — all his risk into the clinic.

After his telephone call, during which the psychiatrist advised him not to make a phone appointment, Guepin's situation was unclear. He was first interviewed by Vladimir Horowitz, chief social worker. What was his sex problem with his wife, children, mother, father, children, employer? Horowitz was looking for emotional, sexual, mental, physical, reasons. He discovered Guepin was married of his mother at 16 and sexually abused his wife and his employer. He was married. He had wanted to be a doctor but his mother had said no, not money. Horowitz's duty in assessing Guepin's sexual problems could be met as his answer: "It has been said, he says, 'That's a great research and history to ask, but it's half the battle of diagnosis.'"

Guepin once realized that his sex problem was being deep in his past and was related to his mother and his parents, and that his was one of all sex deviants. A week later he kept in touch with a senior clinical psychologist, Dr. Patrick, who, under psychological testing, he proved to have an IQ of 125 and answered 227 questions about his relationship with his parents and 115 questions about his sex life.

Whoever coined the phrase "easy as pie" must have been a reputable cook because, pie is easy when you have the recipe, the ingredients and a little practice. We find it quite easy to make the ingredients for you but this, too, takes a lot of knowledge and resources. One of the most vital areas of our operation is Quality Control. The division is responsible for the standard of quality in all Canada Packers' products. For instance, every batch of Quaker Chewy cereal gets rigid tests to make sure that every pound you buy is of a uniform as well as high quality. The same Quality Control applies to all the products that bear the "CP" mark and pledge of best quality—it is our promise to you of "good things to eat."

Quaker is best served at room temperature—refrigeration from your refrigerator does not harm before serving. This means Quaker "chillies" in serving storage.

wanted to build a new wing which would increase patient capacity by 600 beds. The local government was prepared to contribute $2,000 per bed toward construction costs if an equal amount were given by the provincial government. Thus, the hospital would receive a total gift of $4,000 a bed for its planned addition, or $2,400,000 in all.

But last year, says, it used up to $10,000 a head to build a hospital at levelled 10 square. (The Span has large very stiffly square cubes, $17,000 a head today. I think the bill for that was very close to at least $1,500,000. Giving the total cost of $600,000 to be against these patients (who then the two governments). The land was left for the assistance on the Canadian side of the new land colony.

"The Communications of a Nation are as Vital to its Life as its Defences"

Report, Royal Commission on Publications

The Royal Commission on Publications was appointed a year ago to investigate "the present position of and prospects for Canadian Magazines".

The Commissioners were M. Grattan O'Leary, President, Ottawa Journal, J. George Johnston, Chairman and senior partner of Johnston, Evenson and Charlesworth Limited, Toronto, Public Relations' Counsellors, and Claude P. Beaubien, Vice-President in charge of Public Relations, Aluminum Company of Canada. Public hearings were held coast-to-coast in Canada over a period of four months.

On June 15th the Commission's report was tabled in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister, who said then that the Government was giving "careful study to this report and its recommendations in the light of its objective to foster a sound and strong Canadianism".

These recommendations are perfectly clear.

The Commission found that "Canadian periodicals are denied competition on an equitable basis with foreign publications, publishing so-called 'Canadian' editions". It therefore recommended "the elimination of unfair and perhaps ruinous competition".

In doing so, it emphasized that its "sole aim is to prevent the placement of Canadian domestic advertising in foreign periodicals available in Canada and to discourage the use of second-hand editorial material as an enrichment for advertising".

"These practices", the Commission said, "must be stopped, stopped effectively and permanently".

The normal entry of magazines into Canada will not be prevented by any of the Commission's proposals. "The Commission recommends nothing", said the report, "which in any way might obstruct the entry to Canada of foreign periodicals not carrying Canadian advertising directed primarily at the Canadian market".

Because Canada is a large country with a relatively small population, the Commission said "it is largely left to our periodical press, to our magazines big and little . . . to try to interpret Canada to all Canadians, to bring a sense of oneness to our scattered communities".

The Commission's recommendations were a conscious effort to protect this part of the press from abnormal and unfair competition so that Canadian magazines could continue to fulfill this vital function.

WHAT THE COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS MEAN

"Only a truly Canadian printing press, one which the [rest of Canada and directly responsible to Canada, can give in the national interest, the editorial direction and dialogue which are indispensable to a magazine's success." (Report, page 2)

"It is vital that Canadian periodicals are denied competition on an equitable basis with foreign publications, publishing so-called Canadian editions." (Report, page 2)

"The Commission concluded that a presently Canadian periodical press can only exist by securing for Canadian publications, under equitable conditions, a fair share of domestic advertising." (Report, page 2)

"The Commission is applying its conclusions to the Canadian periodical and under two main recommendations:

(1) That the definition of a magazine be a magazine of regularity directed at the Canadian market as a foreign periodical otherwise directed at the Canadian market." (Report, page 2)

(2) That the entry into Canada from abroad of a periodical containing Canadian domestic advertising be restricted under Subsection E of the Customs Act." (Report, page 2)

"It must be clearly understood that the Commission recommended nothing which in any way might obstruct the entry to Canada of foreign periodicals not carrying Canadian advertising directed primarily at the Canadian market." (Report, page 2)

"The Commission's approach is to deal in regard to foreign press that of those by comparison of the fact that Canadian periodicals maintain in the direct interest of a Canadian identity, their responsibility and right to be as free as possible and possible only do not disappear and thus of all things through under restriction from foreign publications, which the situation could be corrected effectively with justice." (Report, page 2)

"This and the only to be the Commission's recommendation." (Report, page 2)
